SENATOR PARK SAYS

CONNECTICUT WOOL IS O.K. Market Can Be Found for All of It

That Is Raised. At the recent meeting of the Con necticut Sheep Breeders' association held in this city, it was said that the held in this city, it was said that the competition of the western states was responsible for the fallure of the sheep raising industry in Connecticut, says the Hartford Times. It was said that it was impossible to raise sheep in competition with the west. If that is a fact it is to be feared that the prospect of the pastures and uplands of Connecticut swarming with sheep and lambs must remain an unrealized dream. There is no way to put a turiff dream. There is no way to put a tariff or any other kind of an embargo on sheep or cattle from the west except by reasons which relate to the public health. The states of the union cannot build up tariff walls, against one an-another. But is that competition from the west as serious as it was stated to

It used to be a common remark that the farmers of the state could not engage in the wool raising industry because of competition. Senator Angus because of competition. Senator Angus Park of the Twentleth district, who is engaged in the wool business, showed the fallacy of that statement at the last session of the general assembly when he said, in a discussion one day in the senate, on a bill to prevent the destruction of sheep by dogs, that it was ridiculous to say that superior wool could not be raised in this state. He said it would, and hey, too, readily conclude that it been not pay. It is true, there is something about farming which does not pay; but it is not the land, It is very often the farmer's idea of farming which is unprofitable.

TREES IN WINTER There Are One Hundred and Eleven-Much Different Proposition Than in

Summer: New England Trees in Winter is the title of bulletin No. 69 just issued by the Storrs Agricultural Experiment station of Connecticut, the authors being A. F. Binkeslee, professor of botany, Connecticut Agricultural college and C. D. Jarvis, horiculturist, Storra Agricultural Experiment station. Agricultural Experiment station.

This bulletin has descriptions and illustrations of one hundred and elever of the common trees of New England as they appear in winter. A tree in winter is quite a different proposition from the same tree in summer, when the branches are all hidden by foliage.

the branches are all hidden by foliage. This bulletin not only describes the trees and their habits of growth, but the illustrations show the complete tree and its branching habits, the bark and buds and in many cases the seeds or fruit. All the illustrations are from criginal photographs of living trees, no museum specimens being used. In the preface the authors state there is no general work upon American trees which combines illustrations of the incividual forms with keys for their identification based upon winter characters. The forester and lumberman, however, are more called upon to distinguish tree in winter when leaves and flowers are fallen than in summer. Trees, as the most conspicuous elements in the winter landscape, must also appeal to the student of outdoor life. The interest shown by classes of that superior wool could not be raised in this state. He said it would, and that a market could be easily secured for every pound that was raised, Isn't it quite possible that the theory about western competition in regard to mutton and lamb, which is so generally entertained, may be just as fallacious as the idea in regard to Connecticut wool which Senator Park combated in the senate? There was a time when it was thought that peaches could not be grown at a profit in this state. Since that idea was exploded many farmers throughout Connecticut have become rich in the raising of the fruit. The land of Connecticut has greater potentialities than what many who are engaged in its cultivation are inclined to admit. In this connection the remark of Senator Joseph W. Alsop of Avon is recalled. It will be remembered the governor of the state of Washington, in his address to the senate at the last session, referred to the agricultural advantages of his state and pointed out the ments in the winter study of twigs collected the previous winter indicated that the winter study of trees can be taken up with enthusiasm by teachers in their schools. In our experience the winter identification of trees has proven to students one of the most interesting subjects of their course. It is of decided value for its training in the power of accurate observation. The work comes at a time when material for matural history study seems scanly and might therefore be used to bridge the previous winter indicated the previous winter indicated the previous winter indicated the previous winter indicated the the theory about the winter study of trees can be taken up with enthusiasm by teachers in their schools. In our experience the work comes at a time when material for matural history study seems scanly and might therefore be used to bridge over the period between fall and syring, which are unfortunately constituted by many the only sensors when study of outdoor life is possible in the schools. In the winter identification of trees has proven t dress to the senate at the last session, referred to the agricultural advantages of his state and pointed out the superiority of its soil. When the senators adjourned for the day, Senator Alsop remarked to a group of his colleagues, who were discussing the remarks of the governor from the west, that much better crops can be raised in Connecticut than in Washington. The senator was willing to back his opinion by a wager. Many people have a mistaken idea of agriculture in this state as an industry, text and illustrations from graphs will furnish the as graphs will furnish the assistance which the current text fail to supply and render the identification of ou
